WINDOW ROCK – On Tuesday, Navajo Nation President Jonathan Nez and New Mexico Pueblo tribal leaders met with U.S. Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-N.M.) and U.S. Secretary of the Interior David Bernhardt, as they visited the Chaco Culture National Historical Park, to continue advocating for the protection of the cultural and historical sites in the area that are sacred to many tribes.

On April 9, U.S. Sens. Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall (D-N.M.) introduced the S. 1079: the Chaco Cultural Heritage Area Protection Act of 2019, which would create a 10-mile “buffer zone” around the Chaco landscape to prevent oil and gas development in the area. U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) and Deb Haaland (D-N.M.) introduced the same bill in the House.

“This is about preserving our teachings and our way of life for Indigenous people. In addition to that, we are encouraging more studies to be conducted to assess the impacts of oil and gas drilling on the health and safety of our people who reside in the area and on the environment. There are many stories and teachings that our people have passed down for generations – it serves as a foundation for the identity of our people,” said President Nez.

Tuesday’s visit was the first time Sec. Bernhardt viewed the Greater Chaco Landscape in person. During the Secretary’s confirmation hearing before the U.S. Senate last month, Sen. Heinrich requested Sec. Bernhardt to visit the area to gain a firsthand perspective of the cultural and historical significance that it holds for tribes.

“I am very grateful to Senator Heinrich, Senator Udall, Congressman Luján, and Congresswoman Haaland for sponsoring the bill and for the Secretary’s visit. I believe through our dialogue, we have a path forward to work together to protect this special area,” added President Nez.

Other tribal leaders in attendance included Pueblo of Isleta Gov. Edward Paul Torres, Pueblo of Acoma Gov. Brian D. Vallo, Santa Ana Pueblo Gov. Tim Manchego, and a representative of Santa Clara Pueblo. Bureau of Land Management New Mexico State Director Tim Spisak and Chaco Culture National Historical Park Superintendent Denise Robertson were also part of the tour.

Sec. Bernhardt said he has a greater appreciation and understanding for the importance and cultural significance of the Chaco landscape for tribes. He added that the U.S. Department of the Interior would revisit its position on the Chaco Cultural Heritage Area Protection Act of 2019 to work together to develop a path forward to address the concerns of the tribes.
